Dr. Siegrist is the author of an internationally established model of work stress, termed "effort-reward imbalance," and his research spans the areas of chronic psychosocial work stress, social determinants of health, measurements of health inequalities, and the sociological aspects of clinical decision-making and evaluation. He serves as Associate Editor of several international journals and as Co-Editor of the new Handbook Series in Occupational Health Sciences. Among other distinctions, he is a Member of Academia Europaea, and a Corresponding Member of the Heidelberg Academy of Sciences. Previous visiting professorships include the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, and the Belle van Zuylen Chair at the University of Utrecht, the Netherlands. As a public health researcher, he is collaborating with the World Health Organization, with a main interest in reducing health inequalities at work.
